Relationship between fluorescence lifetime and state of aggregation of porphyrin molecules in aqueous solution. In this work, we studied the state of aggregation of a series of porphyrins. The probe was the fluorescence lifetime (FL) of the porphyrin molecule. The dependence of FL on the aggregate state and the medium in which the aggregate was formed was examined by a simple solution experiment. (1) The fluorescence lifetime of a porphyrin molecule in the monomeric state decreases with the increase of the aggregate state. (2) The porphyrin in the aggregated state in water has more different FL components than that in the aggregated state in ethanol. (3) The FL component spectra in water and in ethanol are not the same. (4) Compared with the FL component of the aggregated state of the porphyrin in water, the FL component spectra of the aggregated state in ethanol changes the FL components gradually from blue to red as the porphyrin concentration increases, the FL components of the aggregated state in water change to blue when the porphyrin concentration is less than 5 microM, and the FL component spectra of the aggregated state of the porphyrin in ethanol do not change as the porphyrin concentration increases.
