In the game, the mechanics and animations of players have been re-worked to ensure fluidity in movement as well as responsiveness in gameplay, including in close and off-ball situations. The variety in movement options is a key aspect of the game's tactical DNA, with new Pivots, Rotation and Ability options both for players and on-ball actions. Off-the-ball, players can now adjust their position and heading direction in mid-flight to check for new passing options, prevent opponents from turning and knock the ball away when they receive it. Creating Balance The strength of the game is in its responsive gameplay, where a player can adjust their play on the ball to their opponent's movements. It is here that FIFA 21 sets new standards on player-character timing in simulations. In FIFA 21, footballers naturally react to the game-state with their timing. During and after a pass, the ball carrier looks towards the pass as the ball gets closer, and then looks forward to anticipate where it will be. On receiving the ball, the ball carrier must make sure to stop the ball coming towards them at the last minute, or they are easily caught out, like a defender preparing to make a tackle. The game-state, on the other hand, is dynamic, and players must adapt to the game-state and react in real-time to changes in the simulation. In FIFA 22, the game-state has been re-worked to create a new level of balance, where timing is never an excuse in the most in-depth football simulation game on the market. Tactical Timing FIFA 22 will include 'Tactical Timing,' which redefines player character timing. With Tactical Timing, players naturally react to the game-state by looking ahead to how they should move next, rather than forwards looking at the ball. This timing will carry through a player's movement, tackling and off-the-ball behaviours. If a player does not look towards the ball with a pass, they cannot accurately predict where it will go. Therefore, if a player looks after they receive a pass, the ball is there for them to control. On the ball, the player will look to either pass the ball to a friend or to quickly make an accurate pass. When receiving an inaccurate pass, a player will swiftly and immediately look towards the ball,
