Ef West An ef West or east wind (or) is a strong wind that blows (translates as "from") from the west or east, respectively, overland during the winter or fall season in the temperate zone and subtropical climates around the world. In the mid-latitudes, it is often associated with storm systems originating in the ocean. It is often referred to as a "western (or cold) wind" in the English-speaking world. It is called (blizzard) in German, (Western Wind) in Spanish and (West Wind) in Portuguese. Pigment dispersion syndrome is one of the most common causes of low intraocular pressure and glaucoma in Asians. It is characterized by migration of melanin and lipofuscin granules from the nonpigmented ciliary epithelial cells into the anterior chamber. The exact etiologic agent remains unknown. Although there have been many reports of cyclosporin A-induced pigment dispersion syndrome, an apparent association between uveal melanocytic proliferation and pigment dispersion syndrome has not been described. Three cases of pigment dispersion syndrome occurring in patients who had been recently treated with cyclosporin A are described. All patients had sustained marked elevation of intraocular pressure, unilateral or bilateral, as well as ciliary body detachment with posterior synechiae. The clinical features and course of the disease resembled pigment dispersion syndrome. Three years later, a new case of pigment dispersion syndrome in a patient who had received cyclosporin A for focal segmental glomerulosclerosis developed. Although cyclosporin A is associated with the development of pigment dispersion syndrome, the development of an apparent association between uveal melanocytic proliferation and pigment dispersion syndrome, as well as ciliary body detachment with posterior synechiae, raises questions regarding the pathogenesis of pigment dispersion syndrome.Q: CSRF Token not able to track session without AJAX I am creating an application on AngularJS using Flask/Python

Ask HN: Getting out of the Bay Area? - hzh There seems to be a real tech boom going on in other states like Texas (that the working class up there are calling the 'Silicon Prairie').Is there a similar tech scene up there? If not, how does one move there? (Pardon my ignorance) ====== kh_hk I worked for a company called Vignette that solves these questions. I must admit I didn't feel working there was worth it in the end. But I guess the comment is more applicable to the company. I too want to find a work place in another state and have no idea where to do that. ~~~ hzh Thanks, I'm looking for the same thing. ------ ColinWright I'm in exactly the same position - looking for a new job. I'm really tempted to move to the UK, which seems to have more interesting things than the US these days, but there is the family and the local relationships. Unless you have a strong business reason to move,

I'd say stay put. That's not a ruling of any kind, just my opinion. ------ hzh I think it's important to move out of the bay area. Great locations, but the cost of living and commuting is getting ridiculous. ~~~ hzh For someone who likes a backpacker lifestyle, I think it'd be very hard to handle a 9-5 working day. ~~~ stevekemp I worked as a support engineer in London for a few years. The thing which changed the most for me from working in the UK was the more relaxed working hours. I've often been able to finish work at 5pm, to go for a beer with a co-worker, or even go to the pub for a pint or two. I still think it's hard to get that time in when you're in the US. Everyone seems to have a full-time job, and since they can work from home I find that I end up going in at around noon and working through the afternoon. Interdental height index in the assessment of periodontal health status in a family practice setting. To assess the variation in interdental height indexes in population samples to determine the reliability of interdental height
