Pulmonary emphysema is the most serious complication in patients with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease (COPD). It is impossible to diagnose pulmonary emphysema in COPD patients without invasive procedures. Pulmonary emphysema is evaluated by the percentage of airspace enlargement and density of pulmonary parenchyma on chest computed tomography (CT). Various inflammatory markers in bronchoalveolar lavage (BAL) and their alteration in the course of the disease were correlated with the degree of pulmonary parenchymal destruction, which was measured using chest CT scan. Lung function, inflammatory markers and CT measurements were performed in 40 COPD patients with and without pulmonary emphysema and in 10 healthy subjects. In the course of the disease, various inflammatory markers were determined in BAL fluid of each patient. C-reactive protein (CRP) levels in BAL fluid were significantly increased in the patients with emphysema. There were significant correlations between CRP levels, CT measurements and emphysema. Inflammatory markers of lung inflammation (sICAM-1, sVCAM-1, sE-selectin and sL-selectin) were significantly higher in the emphysema group.
