The government reported on Friday that the latest total is the highest number for the 12 years that statistic has been kept. The official number is almost double the 7.45 million jobs the government reported in October. The previous peak was 14.08 million in November 2007, just a few months before the market crash. The gain in jobs between November and December was roughly equal to the total number of jobs created over the previous six months. In December alone, state-owned firms added 0.97 million new employees. The July-to-September data for 2017 was adjusted for seasonal labor, resulting in a quarterly gain of 3.86 million jobs. State-owned firms accounted for 3.94 million of the new jobs. This is the biggest share of the total, but is still only half of the number created last year. "The rise of new job creation is more related to a structural change rather than random fluctuation due to policy," said Wang Tao, chief economist at Industrial Bank of China Ltd., who has also observed a sharp increase in employment, in a note to clients on Thursday. The economy has added 2.68 million jobs in 2017. It's now running slightly above a peak reached in the third quarter of 2015, following a recent rally in commodity prices and the devaluation of the yuan. The jobs surge could be a step back for the new president, Xi Jinping, who has sought to create conditions for more public spending and new energy development in the world's second-largest economy. The number of self-employed workers, a proxy for the private sector, has been rising faster than the total over the past few years.
